If the argument is invalid, then it's a bad argument: it's an argument that is intended to give conclusive support for it's conclusion, but fails to do so. Game over. Think of a student sitting in a mathematics exam and making a crucial mistake in a proof.

Good and bad arguments - FutureLearn

If the claim is supported, the argument is successful; if the claim is not supported, the argument fails. This is the purpose of an argument: to offer reasons and evidence for the purpose of establishing the truth value of a proposition, which can mean either establishing that the proposition is true or establishing that the proposition is false.

What is an Argument?

What is a good argument? For many years this was a matter of intuition to me. Either the reasons make sense, or they don't. But philosophers respond to this question differently. Actually, they have many different ways to answer this, and one is logic. You probably don't know, but I relabeled this blog to fit..

What is a good argument? | Argue as if you dance

A deductive argument, if valid, has a conclusion that is entailed by its premises. The truth of the conclusion is a logical consequence of the premises If the premises are true, the conclusion must be true. It would be self-contradictory to assert the premises and deny the conclusion, because negation of the conclusion is contradictory to the truth of the premises.
